1 Description

This is a graduate-level course on contemporary research on international relations. The core of the field focuses on the causes, dynamics, and consequences of aggression and cooperation between states, and has traditionally revolved around the study of war and peace. We will focus on the study of international conflict, but also on related topics that are often considered within IR, such as the study of internal conflict and processes of political violence, the nature of state size and borders, the influence of the international system on domestic institutions, or processes of international diffusion of norms. We will focus on recent research and on the methodological aspect of studying these topics empirically.

2 Requirements and assessment

Each session will consist of a brief lecture introducing the topic and the main concepts, followed by a seminar discussion on the required readings. Students are expected to attend every week, read the required readings in advance, and actively participate in the discussion. In addition, each student will have to present one of the complementary readings once during the semester. The last session of the course will be a workshop where students present ideas and ongoing work for the final research paper.

Participation (30%): Students are expected to participate in all seminar discussions. In addition, they have to choose three sessions and prepare a brief memo (around 2 pages) for each of them, summarizing and connecting readings. Submission before class starts.

Presentation (10%): Once during the semester, each student will present one of the complementary readings in class, discussing how it relates and complements the main readings.

Research paper (60%): Students are expected to write a short empirical research paper (maximum 4,000 words) in one of the topics covered in the course, using empirical evidence (qualitative, quantitative, or both) to answer a research question. A proposal will be presented and discussed in the last session in class. Deadline TBD (around late May).
